In a game where being able to execute snap turns and dodge oncoming laser fire are essential skills, that can lead to some frustrating trips back to the briefing room.

XWA presents the story of Ace Azzameen, the youngest member of the Azzameen family, a neutral family of traders.

Upon releasing the fire button they soar away from your ship like deadly homing birds, creating a beautiful and ultimately fiery ballet.

You can plug a desktop keyboard into a laptop when it's at your desk, and lots of people do.

Before you start your bloody work there are usually dozens of enemies onscreen, providing you with a 'target-rich environment.

Sylpheed is very much an arcade shooter, right down to the arbitrary clock on each mission.

Why must I turn on javascript to read a book?

Ain't going to happen.

The problem is that friendly fire significantly takes away from your points earned for a given mission.

But the majority of people?

Never gonna worry about it.

It seems to me that the only people who will stay firmly in the "desktop" category are people who by definition don't need the mobility.

I have three desktops, all built by me from parts obtained from Fry's, Ebay and pulls.

When a member of this now-rarefied genre comes lurching at you from the darkness, it's always a good idea to be wary.

It's simple to switch between weapon systems with the twitch of a thumb; the downside to this is that often pits you against a wave of fighters and their destroyer escort at the same time.

Oh, there's already Project Gutenberg?

I would bet money that most laptops being sold today are going to people who are not transporting them very far.
