There were hundreds of us out there.

Rachel's "magic mirror" is a "Hot or Not"-type website, which reassures her daily that she is still fairest in the land.

Where "Crash" was bombastic and heavy-handed, "Elah" is subtle.

And watch his moonwalk, which was pretty cool.

A film like this, you expect to see some good guys doing battles with hordes of zombies.

And having vats of drinks around creates a natural place for congregation and conversation.

Back and forth it ping-pongs until it resembles a soupy muck of intentions and performances, offering neither warmth nor humor, just a headache.

All that chatting makes you thirsty.

But if he had bothered me, I would have walked out of the hall and found someone to talk to.

Dear lord this film is a mess.

We miss Azeem on the Ofcom Consumer Panel and you all in Harrow.

"Good Luck Chuck" isn't quite the twisting knife "Employee" was, but it furthers the strange beautification of Cook as he lunges to be taken seriously as an actor.

He was compelling in "A History of Violence," in which he also collaborated with Cronenberg as a man with an animalistic knack for savagery.

So much of what happens is surprising or frightening, but Cronenberg doesn't draw undue attention to that aspect of it.

The rationale for a news agency being in SL has to be two fold.

A majority of Alba's role is set aside for pratfalls and non-existent chemistry with Cook.
